

No Affirmative Action for Conservatives

By Timothy A. Carney

In his recent op-ed in the Los Angeles Times, my colleague David D. Cole discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are committing suicide by burning bridges, and sexual orientation, race, gender, and other factors like liberalism rather than conserva-
tiveness play a larger role in the decisions of students. He could not be more right.

Redding’s diagnosis of the problem is flawed in a number of important ways. He discusses the problem of self-selection bias that plagues the conservatives and libertarians who have been on the receiving end of this trend. He argues that ideologically liberal students are commitmat